JOAN OF ARC'S HOUSE.

It is in Domremy, and is Now Used as Springfield Republican. Among the many places of interest in Alsace-Lorraine, few are more worthy of Orleans. Many of my readers are probably rvation, being classed among the state monuments. In the house is a little muto Jeanne or her family. The room in her parents are to be seen, and the place Youl, whence a little railroad runs along the banks of the Meuse, and one alights at a little station just opposite Domremy, Any one who may be traveling in that part of France will find the trip well worth the

Domremy, as everybody knows, is a little village in the "department" of the Vosges, situated on the banks of the Meuse, about three miles from Neufchateau and near the | Christian Temperance Union. frontiers of the "departements" of the Meurthe and the Haute-Marne. If the place did not possess historic interest, no traveler would turn aside from his route to visit it, for in itself it is nothing remarkable, but there in 1410 Jeanne d'Arc was born church, which is dedicated to St. Remy, In this church, in which Jeanne was baptized, are still to be seen two stone figures of angels bearing a shield with the arms of the du Lys. These figures which stand one on each side of the high altar, though very the respect of her compatriots for the memory of Jeanne. Montaigne who passed through Domremy about the year 1581, says in his voyages: "I saw the front of the little cottage in which Jeanne d'Arc was born, painted over possession it came after the family d'Arc, | poisoning. added to it at various epochs. A very interesting fact connected with the house itself was the discovery of a statue which was built in and almost concealed by the wall, above the entrance. This statue, discovered in 1756, is sculptured in the same kind of stone of which the house is built. It represents Jeanne kneeling, bare headed, and clad in armor. Strange to say, she is represented with long hair, on which one can still see some traces of gilding; this would lead one to imagine that she had long, fair hair, did not all the historians agree in saying that she had beautiful black hair, which she wore short in order to be more at ease in the combat. This statue, which is not badly carved, is perhaps the only existing authentic representation of the features of the "maid;" unfortunately it has been much damaged; the tip of the nose is gone the feft corner of the mouth has suffered, the right arm is broken off at the shoulder, which latter was perhaps the reason that Above the entrance door there is an ornament composed of two stones with Gothic sculptures representing coats of arms, and | observes; perhaps there were other paint- home in Terre Haute. but now one sees but faint traces color. The sheaf of corn, the words 'Vive labeur." and the shield bearing three plowshares allude of course to the occupation of Jeanne's parents. The shield bearappears to be 1481, and the words "Vive le roy Loys," give reason to believe that these sculptures were executed during the reign of Louis XI, perhaps by his order. The shield on the right-hand side represents the blazon accorded to Jeanne and her family by Charles VII. Through modesty the maid always refused to place on her shield the arms which recalled the services she had rendered to her king. It was in December, 1429, after the siege of Orleans, that the "gentle dauphin," as she in her naive language called Charles VII, issued an edict declaring that she, her family and descendants to perpetuity were ennobled and rendered capable of acquiring and possessing any noble fief. The date of the edict which prescribed the arms of the family is not known. The family took the name of du Lys. The arms are on ; blue ground, a drawn sword, silver and gold, sustaining on its point the closed crown of France, supported by two golden fleurs de lis. The family du Lys became extinct in the direct line in the person of M. Henri-Francois du Lys, canon of Cham-

peaux and prior of Coutras; there are, however, some persons in Lorraine who sion in 1815 that people began to think about the house of Jeanne d'Arc. The officers of the allied armies visited it with the greatest interest, each of them, before leaving the village, securing some splinters from the beams or floor to preserve as precious relies. The princess of the house of Austria came, also, to gaze upon the simple dwelling of the woman who, four centuries before, had driven the enemy from that land of France which all Europe was now invading. A Prussian nobleman offered the proprietor, M. Giradia, 6,000 francs for the louse, but M. Giradin declined the offer. This coming to the ears of the French government it immediately proposed to purchase the house. M. Giradin, a retired soldier, contented himself with the modest sum of 2,500 francs. Louis XVIII hearing corded a sum of 20,000 frames to the pre-

of this disinterested act sent M. Giradin the cross of the Legion of Honor and acfecture of the Vosges to be employed in founding a school for young girls and to erect a monument to the memory of Jeanne d'Arc. The General Council of the depart ment decided on the erection of a fountain on which should be placed the marble bust of Jeanne, which Louis XVII had also presented to Domremy.

The first stone of this foundation was laid July 25, 1820, and on Sept. 10 all was ready for the inauguration ceremony,

Some arrangements were made in the interior of the cottage; in the room in which Jeanne is said to have been born a hearth was replaced, which had been removed to an adjoining room by a former proprietor, the windows were filled with glass painted in the fifteenth century style and bars were fixed to the windows in places where marks in the wall shows that such had formerly existed. A marble tablet was fixed in the wall bearing the inscription recording the date and the reasons for the work done to perpetuate the memory of Jeanne d'Arc. and finally a marble bust of Louis XVIII was placed over the chimneypiece, and to

ANNEXATIONISTS IN HAUGHVILLE NOT TO BE TAKEN UNAWARES.

To Make Nominations to Head Off Flack Crowd in Case Town Is Kept Out of the City.

While West Indianapolis, Brightwood and Mount Jackson are now legally a part of the city of Indianapolis, Haughville is still a part of the city is now an anxious question to the suburbanites. Joseph F. Flack would have it remain independent, while 90 per cent. of its citizens pray that it will become a part of the city. The filing of an injunction and a protest against the annexation of Haughville by Mr. Flack has complicated matters and aroused the indignation of the citizens of that suburb. As these suits have been docketed they are not to be heard until May 3, although a rumor was started in Haughville yesterday that the cases had been advanced on the docket and were to be called to trial either

Saturday or to-morrow. As it will be a matter of conjecture as to whether Hauhgville will or will not become a part of the city until after May 3, it has been deemed advisable by the annexationists to place a local ticket in the field in opopsition to the Democratic ticket, which, through the foreknowledge given the members of the party by Mr. Flack, was chosen at the time set by the law. The only thing that remains in order to establish opposition is for the suburbanites to place an independent ticket into the field, and this will be done, and it is understood holders will hold over for another year, and this the progressive citizens are determined

BANK OF ENGLAND FORGERY. Thousand Counterfeit Notes Astonish the Officials.

London Daily Mail. The authorities of the Bank of England are engaged in endeavoring to unravel one of the most daring and successful forgeries of their notes that has been perpetrated during the past quarter of a century. The forgeries are confined to £10 notes, and some £19,000 is, so far as has at present been ascertained, involved. The seriousness of the forgery is aggravated because the notes are printed on paper which cannot, even by experts, be differentiated from the genuine Bank of England paper, and the notes can only be pronounced forgeries when individually checked at the bank by bank officials able to refer to the bank's confidential books as regards the secret cypher marks of the

How, then, did the discovery come to be made? It was made as the result of pure About five weeks ago two £10 Bank of England notes passed through the hands of one of the cashlers of the chief branch of the bank. The cashier, though never for a moment doubting the genuineness of the notes, happened to formally check their validity by referring to certain books. He was astounded to find that the secret cypher marks were wanting on both, and, though the letterpress, printing and signature of the head cashier were perfect, and, more extraordinary still, the very paper itself was of the same texture and quality as genuine notes in circulation, yet he had no other course left but to pronounce the two notes forgeries.

The governor of the bank and Messrs, Freshfield, its solicitors, were at once communicated with. Prompt steps were taken, The treasury and Scotland Yard were communicated with, and since then the private staff of detectives of the bank, the detectives of the city police and those of Scotland Yard have been untiring in their efforts to find the source of the forgeries. No fewer than forty detectives are at present conducting investigations. Some are in Liverpool and the other big cities throughout England. Others are in Paris and Vienna and various continental cen-

This much has been ascertained: The notes, bearing dates in January of this year, are perfect specimens and defy identification except by a Bank of England expert, with his private books of reference.

They have been printed in Vienna. The gang of forgers is a large one. In January the notes were suddenly put in circulation by being exchanged all in one day at twenty-five bureau de change in Paris, simultaneously, a circumstance indicating that there are at least twenty-five members in the gang. About one thousand notes are in circulation, and of this number a good many have already been presented at the Bank of The further intention of the gang is, i is surmised, to pass more of these forged notes during the approaching racing season

So far the detectives have been baffled to ascertain more facts about this clever gang and their great coup. What has startled the Bank of England more than anything else is the reproduction of their own paper with the proper watermark. This is a sensation bound to have far-reaching effects. This case will recall former Bank of England forgeries, especially the great frauds of the brothers Bidwell and George McDon-

These were three American forgers who. while visiting England, got delayed in the traffic outside the Mansion House for a few minutes. "Look," said McDonnell, "there's the Bank of England, the safest place in the world. I believe we could hit it for a million." The remark was treated jocularly, the traffic moved and the three passed

Next day they went to Windsor to see the Castle, and while standing in the stateroom one of the Bidwells said he could not get McDonnell's remark about the Bank of England out of his head. The three went out on to the terrace of the castle, and there and then discussed a plan of cam-

In pursuance of the tactics ultimately adopted, Austin Bidwell stationed himself outside the bank to watch the customers. He selected three to try, and found two useless for his purpose. The third was a tailor in Savile row, and him Austin Bidwell proceeded to cultivate assiduously. He ordered clothes on a big scale, and after some weeks mentioned that he was going | 10 shooting in Ireland, but before going wanted to invest his spare cash somewhere -a matter of £1,000. Would the tailor invest it? No. the tailor would not, but the tailor suggested as an alternative, as Bidwell had hoped, that the money should be banked, and before the sun set that day the tailor had introduced Bidwell, or "Mr. Warren," as he called himself, to the Western branch of the Bank of England. The manager was impressed by "Warren," and gave the new depositor every information in his power respecting the method of transacting bank business. Bidwell left £2,000 there for several months, and established credit. Good bills were paid into 'Warren's" account, and then forged bills while the hard cash so obtained went among the confederates. But in the hour of their elation the plotters overlooked the fact that on two bills there were no dates. The bank unsuspectingly sent to the supposed acceptors to have the emission rectified, and so the forgeries were instantly detected. The three men were eventually sentenced to penal
